	Foreword
---	-------------------	---

PERHAPS never since the really old days, has story-telling had such a large place in the life of the child as at the present time. The demand for the story is felt by the teachers in all the grades, by the director on the playground, by the librarian, and by the Sunday School instructor. As for the mother, she has always recognized the value of the story, but even her recognition, and her need, at the present time seems a more definite and specific one.

With the demand for the story comes the need for the right material. The average teacher, student and parent have all too little time at their disposal to search for good material,—material which will require the least possible preparation in the matter of adaptation.

The following stories have been tested in many schools and grades, and the present classification is the result, the story being finally placed in the grade where the appreciation and understanding seemed to demand it.

That there are sometimes but three or four stories taken from a book does not mean that the remaining stories may not be excellent, but rather that those mentioned have been found especially suited for the place given them in this outline.—I. O. MacKenzie.

"The mere fact that a thing has existed for a thousand or two thousand years is not always proof that it is worth preserving. But the fact that after having been repeated for two thousand years, a story still possesses a perfectly fresh attraction for a child of to-day, does indeed prove that there is in it something of imperishable worth."—Felix Adler.

"The moral ideas inculcated by the fables are usually of a practical, worldly wisdom sort, not high ideals of moral quality, not virtue for its own sake, but varied examples of the results of rashness and folly. This is, perhaps, one reason why they are so well suited to the immature moral judgments of children."—Charles A. McMurray.
